March 7, 2014

The Federal Court of Appeal in Canada, in its recent reversal of the Toronto Real Estate Board case, changed the game for determining Abuse of Dominance in Canada – or did it? The Court overturned the Tribunal decision – which had found that a real estate board could not engage in abuse of dominance with respect to members, because it was not a competitor of the members – but how broad is the decision? Does an “anti-competitive act” have to be targeted at a rival in some sense? Join our panel of experts to understand the implications of the latest Canadian turn of events.
